Antoni Gaudí
(1852–1926)

1910

Original model, restored and polychromed.
Scale 1:25

In 1910, this model was displayed at the Société Nationale des Beaux-Arts, in the Grand Palais Paris. For the exhibition, Gaudí commissioned Josep Maria Jujol, his close collaborator, to do the polychromy work. It is the first and only time in the architect's life that his work was on display abroad. The exhibition was organised by a group of French historians and critics who admired Gaudí and wanted to spread his innovative architectural ideas around the world.

Cartagena and Alfonso X, "the Wise"

The bishopric of Cartagena

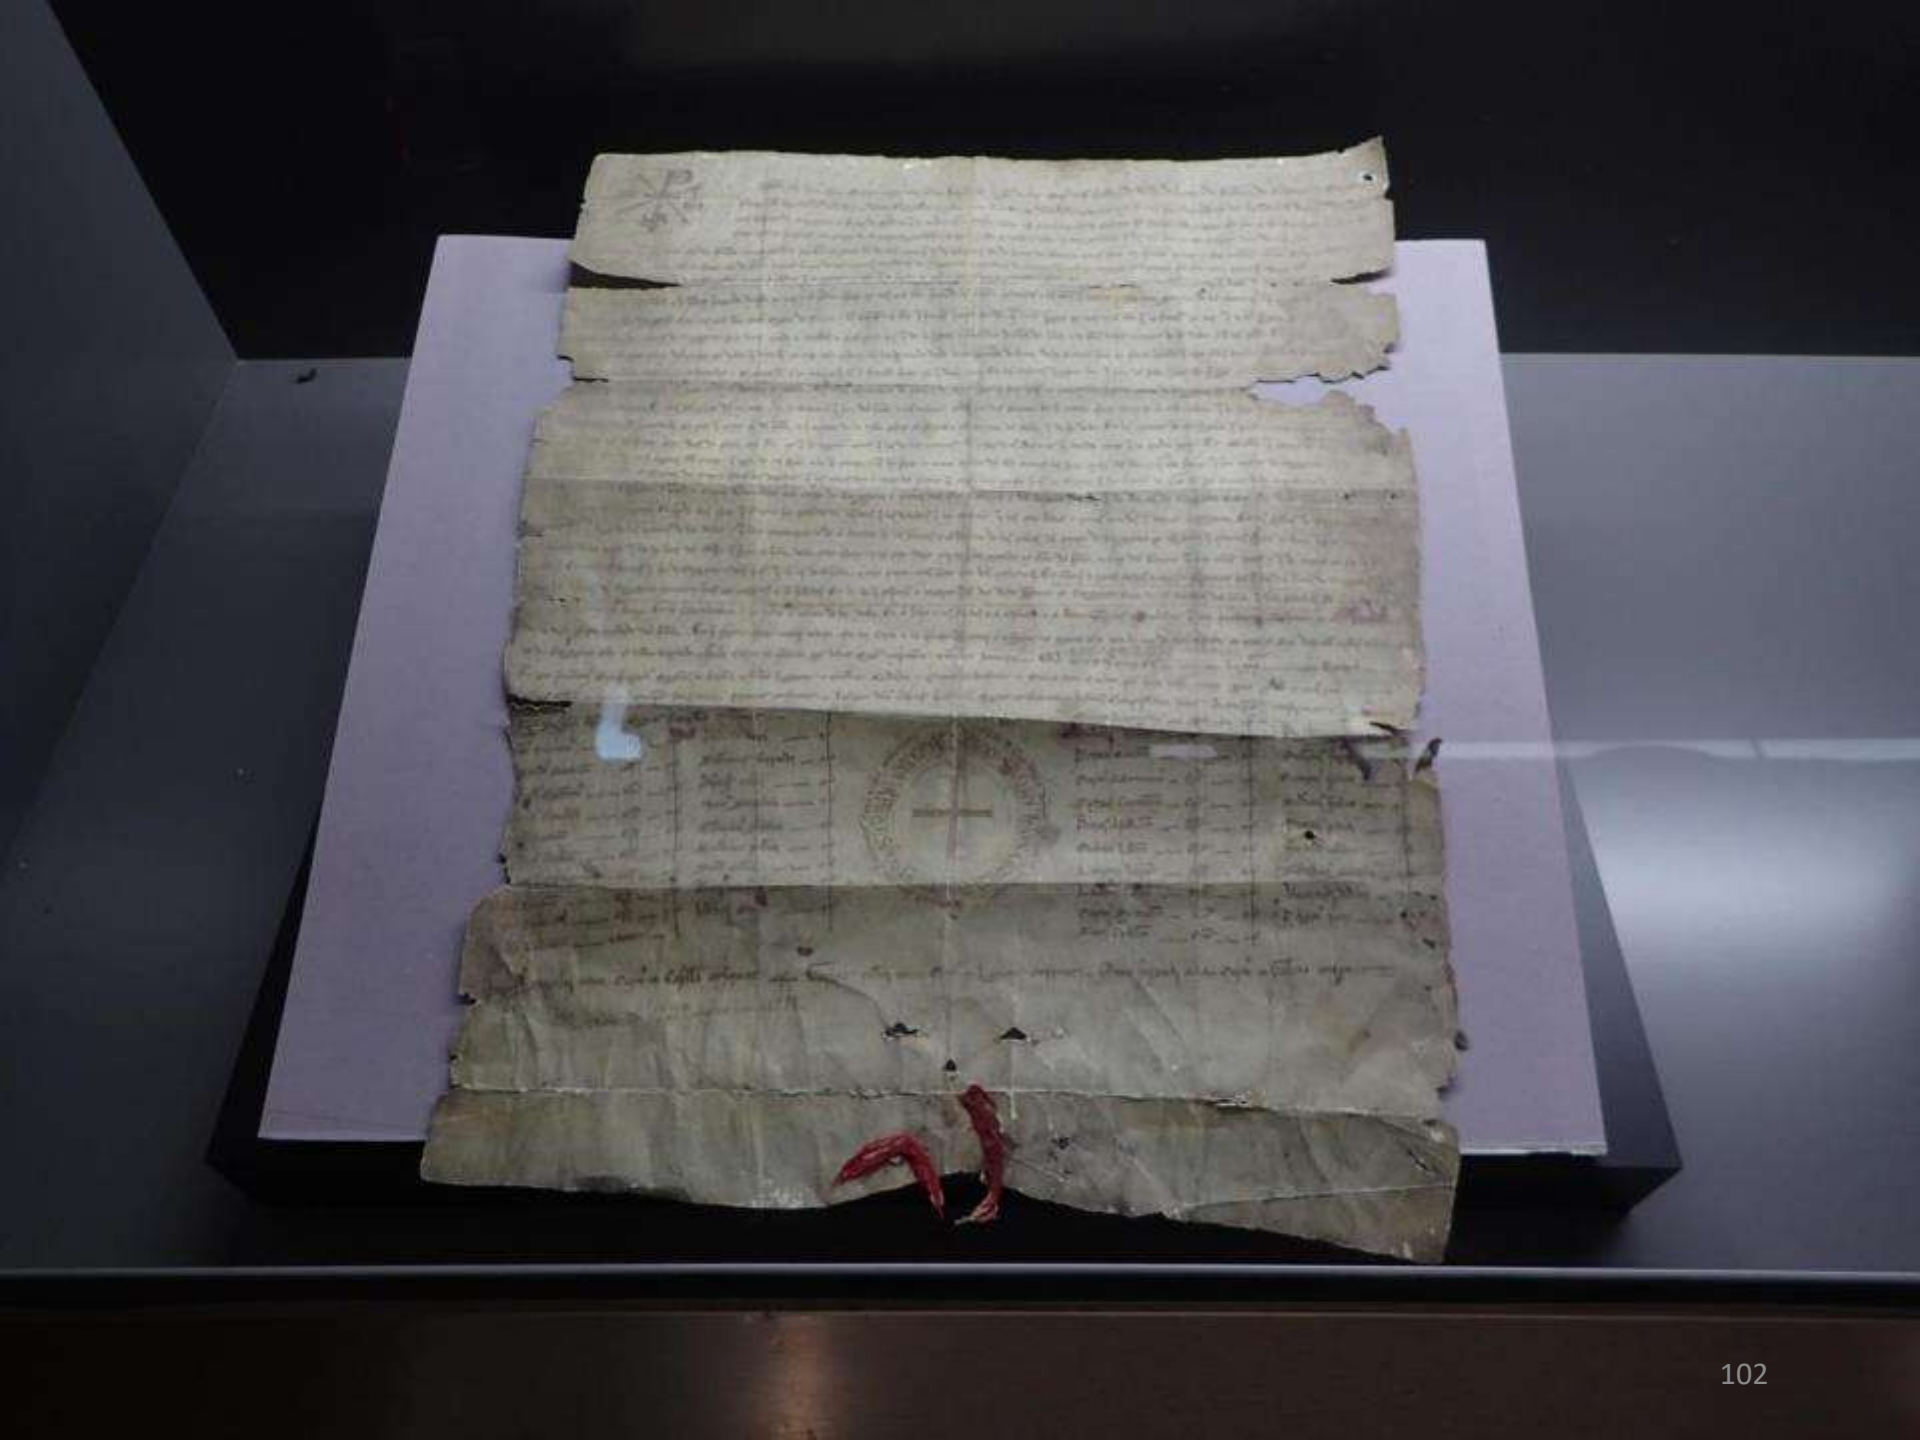

The "reinstatement" of the bishopric of Cartagena was a project of the first order aimed, among other objectives, at re-launching the importance of the town and enabling it to benefit from the advantages of the fact that it housed the powerful Episcopal government. The new diocese covered an extensive territory from the Spanish south-east, the site of the kingdom of Murcia. But very soon the danger of these new headquarters became apparent, as well as the rapid process of depopulation that ensued. Thus, in 1291 the transfer of the bishop's residence and its town hall to the kingdom's capital was already a fait accompli.

CARTAGENA AND ALFONSO X, "THE WISE"

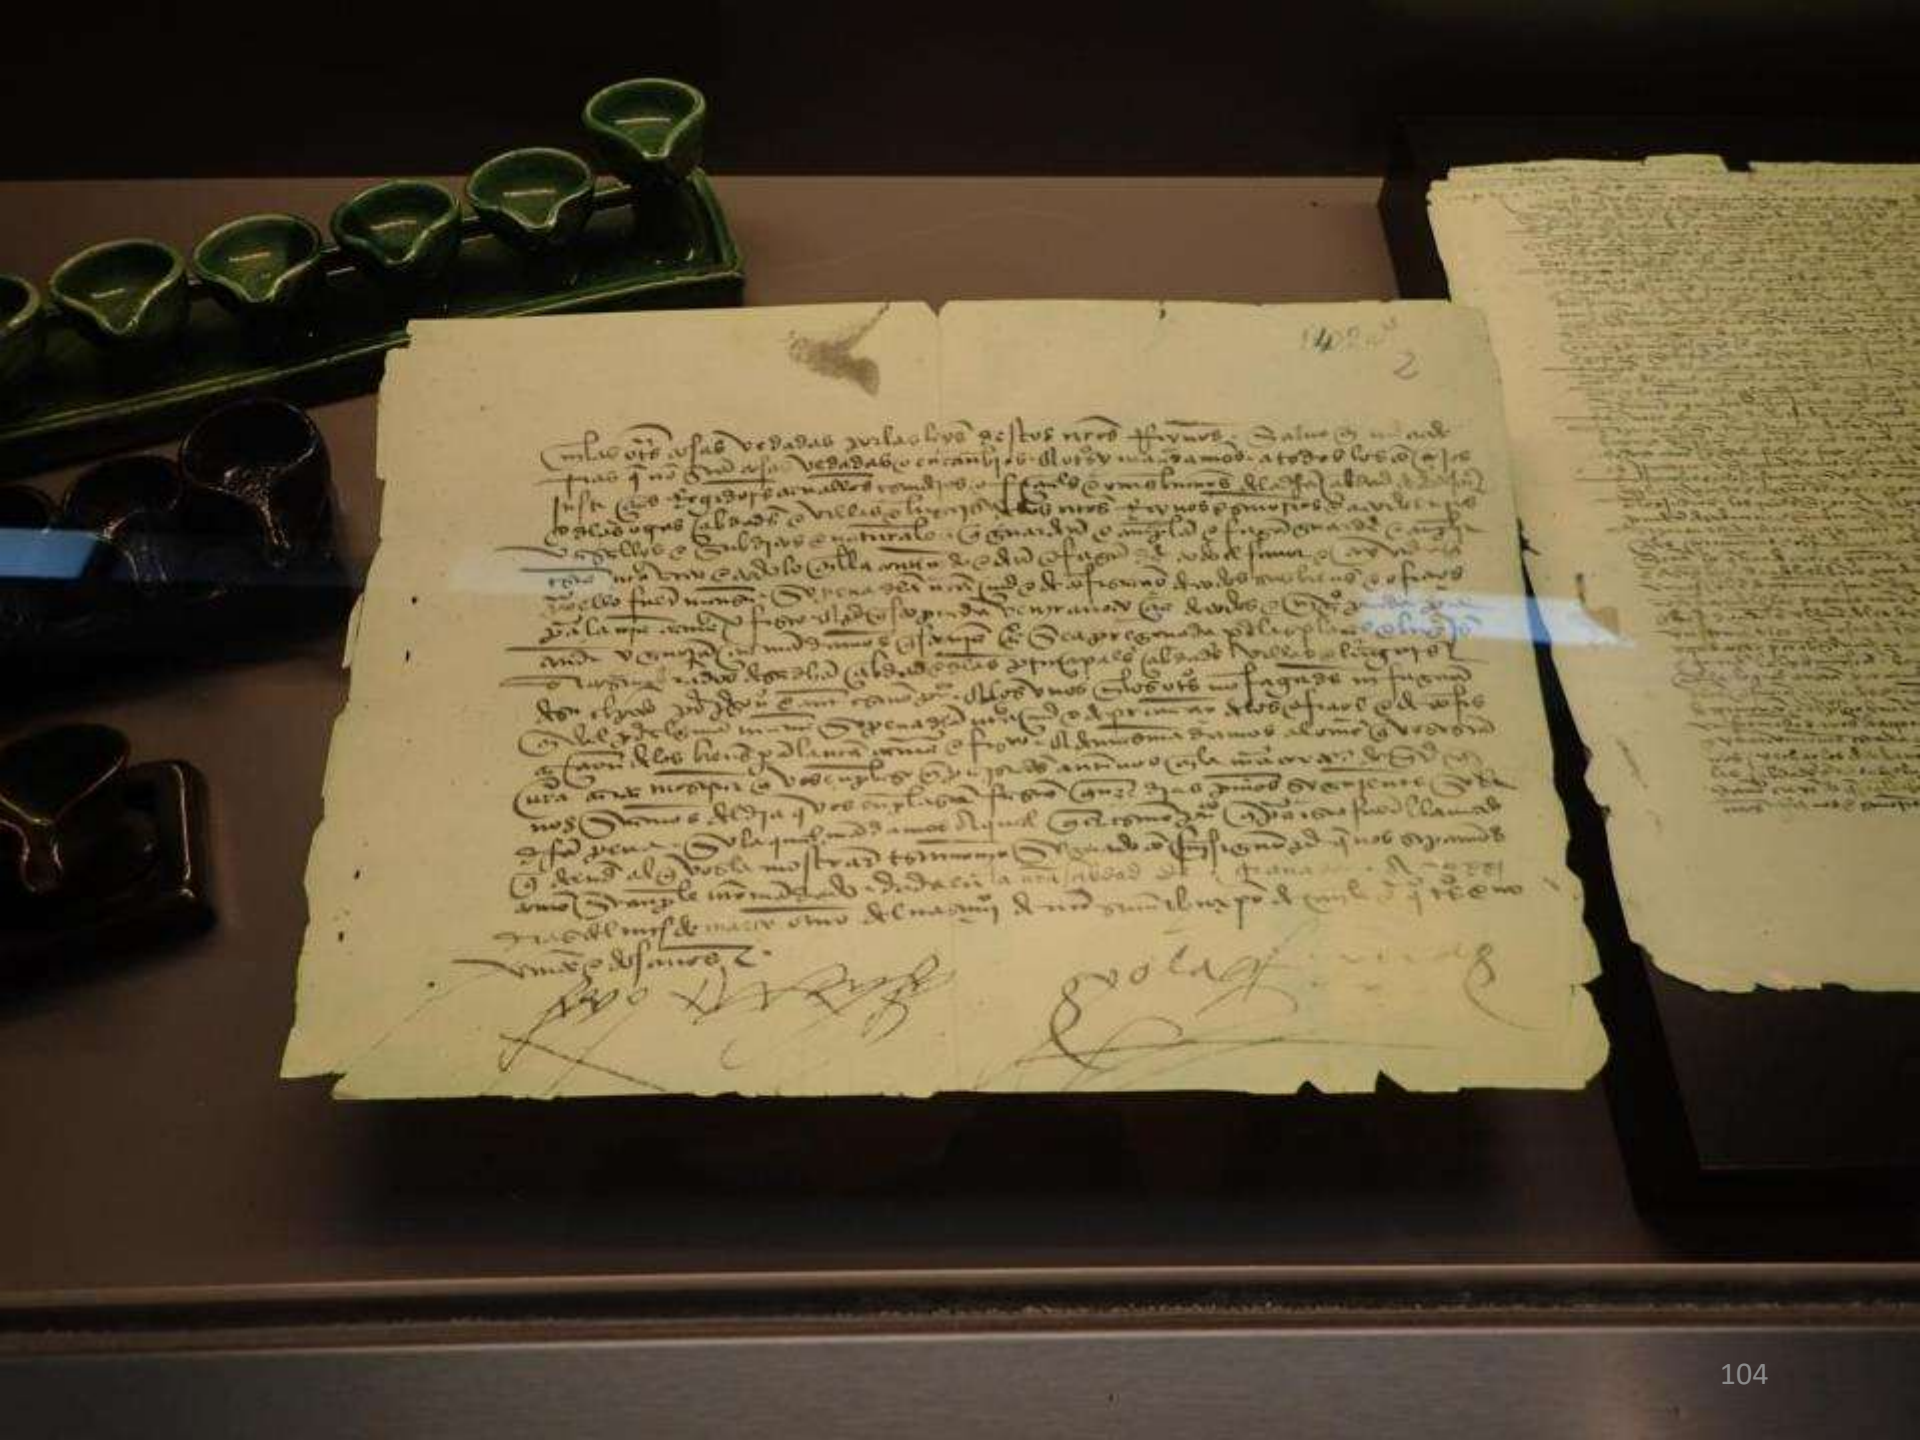

The dating of the empire and the order of St. Mary of Spain

Alfonso X, the Wise, was the descendent of the last family to hold the crown of the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, the most important political objective of which was to occupy the imperial throne.

Against this background, 1272 saw the creation of the Military Order of Santa María of Spain, an order with a clear seafaring vocation and whose convent headquarters were located in Cartagena. The city's port provided privileged access to the Mediterranean, enabling direct contact with the European world.

However, Alfonso failed to obtain sufficient backing, and in 1275 he renounced the sceptre of the Empire once and for all.

En su origen este espacio era una sala de banquetes diáfana con dos pilares y abierta a la calle a través de una puerta y una ventana. En el año 218, gobernando el emperador Heliogábalo, el Edificio del Atrio se reformó y cambió de función, lo que supuso la compartimentación de la estancia en cuatro habitaciones con una columna central. Las paredes se pintaron en blanco con motivos geométricos de varios colores. En la segunda mitad del siglo III d.C., estos ambientes acogieron una vivienda a la cual corresponden los suelos de tierra conservados.

This room at first was originally a two-pillared open-plan banqueting area opening onto the street through a door and a window. In 218, under the reign of Emperor Elagabalus, the atrium building was reformed for other purposes. The room was then broken up into four with a single central column. The walls were painted white with geometric motives of several colours. In the second half of the third century CE the building was taken over as a dwelling, the earthen floors of which can still be seen.
